The Journey's End.

Dragging Itself westward across the dreary plains of Utah, the overland train, from a vantage point in the sky, looked like a small horse hair snake crawling over the earth's surface. The earth-almost the air-was white with the heat of the summer sun. All this was vastness, immensity silence, loneliness; above, the flawless blue; below, these seemingly illimitable plains of reddish yellow, streaked with alkali white that swam back and forth before the eye in parallel lines, until far off they melted into a long, low stretch of shivering light, the mocking water mirage at the base of the mountain range, hundreds of miles away. Encompassed within that horizon there was no thing of life except within that desui-tory moving train. tory moving train.

Stocked in the immigrant or third-class Stocked in the immigrant or third-class car of the train was a crowd of tired, miserable and dirty people. They looked out listlessly at the passing landscape or stupidly at each other, or twisted themselves into all sorts of uncomfortable positions on the hard, wooden scats in the vain efforts to secure a little sleep. Perhaps the most unprepossessing of them all was a dark featured, roughly dressed man. Beside him was a very little girl in a blue dress. His lowering, repeliant face had a scowl upon it, which suggested the convict or the desperado, but he was neither. The scowl and the unconscious sneer about his ugly mouth were born simply of a long and thoroughly fruitless struggle with

MRS ELIZABETH J SOMERS, Section of the and one section of the section of the angle of the section of the angle of the section problem to the man whose arm was about her, and whose knitbrows and troubled face showed how hard it was he studied it. A crazy letter had come to him across the continent, and he had left the tenements of New York to try and reach the golden land of California. He had started with hardly sufficient money to take himself and child sufficient money to take himself and child more than half the distance, but he had a more than half the distance, but he had a confused sort of an idea that he would in some way reach his destination. Better it was, at all events, than to remain in the noisome Hester street den, where without work or the prospects of any his little sum of money would soon be gone.

The station to which his scanty purse had enabled him to buy a ticket for himself and child had been passed hours being, and he was wondering how soon the conductor of the train would discover the shameless imposition he was practicing upon the railway position be was practicing upon the railway company. He had not much longer to wait, for presently the autocrat of the train, in a hurried passage through the car, stepped suddenly before him and glauced at the cheek in his bat.

"Hello! Where are you going?"
The man looked up in what was intended as an humble, respectful and pitcous appeal, but his lip curied up over his teeth, like that of a harried dog. He could not help it. His voice was mild enough, though, as he said: "I am going to California, sir, with my little girl."

The man's looks seemed to irritate the not-too-even temper of the railway offi-

"You are, eh? "Well, where's your ticket for the rest of the way?"

"If you would please let me go through the train with my little girl," replied the unfortunate one, faltering, "I think I could raise the money."

"Go through the train? Not much. Third-class passengers stay in this car. You get off at the next station," said the conductor in a voice of fierce warning, as he passed on.

In about an hour the conductor came into the car again and gave the bell rope a vicious pull. The engine responded with two short whisties, and gradually the train slackened its speed and stopped.

"Come, now, you get off here." said the conductor, roughly; "we're behind time already; and you want to hurry up about it."

Again the man's lip curied in an ugly.

Again the man's lip curled in an ugly way, but he made no answer, except to gather up the few paper bundles of bread and meat on the seat before him. Then, taking his child in his arms, he followed the conductor to the platform and stepped off the train. Before it was under way, however, a bumane brakeman on the last conductor to the platform and stepped off the train. Before it was under way, however, a humane brakeman on the last step called out to him:

"Say, pariner, ther' ain't nothin' here. This is only a flag station. The east-bound'il be along in a few hours. Stop her and board her. The conductor on that train'il let you on. It's a shame to put that kid off in such a place."

In truth, little about the place indicated a railway station. There was a little cloted sentry-box-looking affair beside the track, and fifty yards behind it the remains of an old dugout. Not even a trail thowed where it was that any human being had visited the spot. And around was the dreary waste of billowy plains and the burning tun overhead.

In the rear of the sentry box its projecting roof had cast a little shade, and here the man sat down upon the ground with his child in his arms. Strange things, for him, came in his eyes—tears. The little one looked at him in a puzzled way, and he hostily brushed his hand across his face and left a broad smudge of railway, soot upon his cheek. She closped her hands and hughed with glee at his funny face.

Then this teams to the second and hughed with second the second his face and left a broad smudge of railway soot upon his cheek. She closped her hands and hughed with glee at his funny face.

B. M. PREVOST, J. R. WOOD, Gen. Man. Gen. I am. Agt torturing, unreasoning thirst which the desert alone can give. The child cried for water, and the father left her in the scanty shade and stepped out into the glaring sum. Neither in the sky nor in the parched ground was there a drop of meisture, and he knew it. He returned and tried to comfort her, and then he sat down again, buried his face in his hands and tried to think. The evening was coming on when he arote to his feet with a new resolve. torturing, unreasoning thirst which the

Away far off in the West a thin, almost imperceptible streak of smoke told him that the east bound train was approach-ing. Near the track be found a dirty shred of a flag hanging to a stick, and he placed it in the socket of the upright post standing in front of the house. Nervously his fingers fumbed in his pockets until he produced the stump of a lead pencil. Picking up a piece rough letters:

SOME ONE TAKE THIS CHILD SHE HAS NO PARENTS. With a string he placed the placard around the neck of the little girl. This done he took her in his arms, and kissed her again toog her in his arms, and kissed her again and again, pointed to the smoke that was becoming blacker and longer, and told her that water was coming. When the rails be-gan to sing of the approach of the coming train, he placed her near the track and then ran and bid himself beltind the dugout. From his hiding place he looked out and eagerly watched the child, while the rattle and clamer and thunder of the train grew loader in his ears. On it came with a rush and roar, and flew past the station in a gale of wind and dust. The man's heart died within him, and then it beat wildly again

The train had stopped several hundred yards past the station and was coming back to the sentry box. The engineer had seen the tattered flag. As the long train rolled slowly backward, curious and inquiring heads protruded from the car windows. The gold emblazoned conductor stepped off and looked about him in wonder. Not for several moments did he discover the child.

several moments did he discover the child. Immediately there was a crowd about it, and the placard was passed from hand to hand. A white jacketed porter came out of a Pullman car and placed a wooden step on the ground before it. He was followed by a lady in black, who descended from the car and joined the throng.

A pair of yearning, eager, beseeching eyes watched it all from the dugout. To the man in hiding it seemed that the determination of the child's fate never would be reached. Finally he saw the lady in black take the child in her arms, kiss it and re-enterthe car withit. The passengers scrambled back into the cars, the conductor waved his hand and the train moved on. waved his hand and the train moved on.

Then the father came forth and gazed Then the father came forth and gazed longingly at the departing train—gazed at it until it became smaller and smaller—until it became a dot in the plains—until it vanished—and he knew he was alone.

her, but it was vain—he could not forget his thirst.

The terrible tun rose the next day and looked down upon him as its victim. He endeavored to eat fome of the bread he had saved, but the dry crembs were tor ture to his throat. One thing only was there to do—to follow the track until av inhabited station was reached. It might be fifty milet—it might be more—but there was no salvation away from the railread.

At noon, when resting for awhile, he heard the rattle of an approaching freight train. Hope swelled up within him as he stood on the track and made frantic motions to stop the train. The trainmen unerly laughed at him. He did not know he had employed the favorite ruse for tramps.

After this his progress was very slow. On the third day he came to the end of his journey. He may have been delirious of he may have been quite tane. A train stopped for him and took him on board. This they always do when they kill a man.—San Francisco Argonaut.
